

As Professor George Vithoulkas enters his 50th year as one of homeopathy's greatest and most prolific teachers, he discusses his theory of how homeopathy works in the quantum field, in an exclusive interview with New Homeopath. He also outlines the action homeopaths must take to propagate homeopathy and ensure its survival in a mainstream medical world.

THE SPIN OF ELECTRONS A QUANTUM THEORY FOR HOMEOPATHY

What is your understanding of how homeopathy works?

This is such an important issue that I believe that the one who will answer it will revolutionise not only homeopathy but the whole of medical practice. I do not claim to have the answer, but perhaps my way of thinking on this question may intrigue some research scientists, like those working in the field of quantum physics, in laboratories like CERN, to investigate this matter.

Sometime ago I was discussing this matter with a physicist working in a similar research laboratory and I would like to give you the gist of my discussion concerning this important issue, as I tried to explain it to him.

I told him that my perception, after so many years of experience in treating all kinds of diseases, is that the highly potentised remedy, if it is synchronised in order to be appropriate for the case, at the moment of touching the organism causes a phenomenon of an electromagnetic nature. After such a contact, several serial events will take place until symptoms start to manifest. One of these serial changes within the organism most probably is the change in the spin of the electrons.

This thought implies that during the beginning of sickness, a change in the electrons' spin will take place, which would then become more chaotic.

I would like to explain the way I understand it. When an organism is stressed (diseased or unbalanced) and the chronic disease is in its beginning, there is a change in the spin that is 'harmonious'; for example, the spin of the electrons changes from clockwise to anticlockwise. As the chronic condition becomes deeper and deeper, the spin movement tends to become more and more chaotic until the system cannot tolerate this chaotic situation anymore. It then jumps into a new chronic mode of movement which is more anomalous, but still somewhat organized. In ▶

About the author

Since 1968, Professor George Vithoulkas has trained thousands of homeopaths and medical doctors in classical homeopathy. He has eight honorary professorships and is twice Doctor Honoris Causa. He has received many awards, including the Right Livelihood Award, the alternative Nobel Prize, for his contribution to the revival of homeopathic knowledge and for training homeopaths. His college, the International Academy of Classical Homeopathy, is spearheading research into homeopathy and its integration into mainstream medical practice.

any case, this movement is different from the original movement of electrons when the system was in a state of healthy balance.

An example of the drastic change from one state to another is in the case of epilepsy. During an epileptic fit, the spin becomes crazy, totally chaotic, but after the crisis the system returns to a steadier, but still unbalanced, state.

Needless to say that analogous changes in the movements of all small particles (quarks, bosons, etc.) inside the nucleus of the atom are also happening, but I believe are much more difficult to discover.

If we could show the change in the spin of the electrons in the disease, this would be sufficient to explain the action of the potentised remedy. The highly potentised homeopathic remedy, once it is chosen correctly, most probably brings about a reset in the disturbed field of the electrons' spin.

Why do you say this?

Experience has shown me that the effect of the highly potentised homeopathic remedy is instant, with lightning-like speed, on a level that can only be within the force field of the organism.

During the beginning of a disease, this initial disturbance of the force field cannot be observed and examined with today's experimental equipment, except on one subatomic structure: the electron's behaviour. Perhaps in the coming years we may have the technology to investigate how disease changes the flavour of some other small particles like quarks, bosons, etc.

I believe that it is now time, with the research that has been taking place in quantum physics so far, to open such discussions and start serious investigations in the existing laboratories.

Do you have a general theory of what is happening with high potencies, and perhaps which is the most appropriate potency to be used?

I do have some ideas, but it is too early to discuss at this time. Suffice it to say that what Hahnemann called the vital force is not a simple, unified force but an extremely complex and multilevel field of subtle forces.

In my understanding, the force fields are more subtle than atoms, electrons, nuclei, quarks, bosons and the Higgs particle. They are of the order actually of quantum force fields that are constituting the archaic building blocks of life.

I hope that soon, scientists who are working in these laboratories will realise that after breaking down the Higgs particle, a more subtle reality in the form of force fields will open in front of them. The investigation of such fields of force will be the future objective of scientific research that I believe will give answers to many enigmas existing today in medicine.

Which is your favourite aphorism, and why?

It is number 153 which says that in order to match the most similar remedy to a specific pattern of a patient's symptoms, you must take into consideration primarily the most striking, strange and peculiar symptoms.

In homeopathy, we have the most individualised system for treating individuals and this quality of our treatment should not only be promoted but also applied properly. I am not sure that all practitioners of homeopathy understand the importance of this paragraph of the Organon, as in every case the practitioner should pick these most peculiar symptoms that constitute the essence of the case.

The essence of the case is not a particular sensation, feeling or thought, but a combination of the strange, rare and peculiar symptoms that give an overall picture characteristic of a remedy as we know it from

What do you mean by complete education?

It is true that no educational course on classical homeopathy at this stage could be considered as totally complete or final, but one that has passed the scrutiny of several medical universities and has been adapted by them, like our E-Learning course¹ at the International Academy of Classical Homeopathy (IACH), could perhaps be considered today one of the most complete in classical homeopathy. The holders of the Diploma from this school are having the best possible results in practice, judging from the thousands of positive comments we have received about this course.

In the last two years, students of the Academy have published cured cases in conventional medical journals for the first time in the history of homeopathy. It is very important that such cases, of patients treated with the individual remedy, were accepted for publication in conventional peer-reviewed journals (see Box 1). This is what I mean by saying we need to work hard.

We hear that you have presented your work to conventional medical congresses. What kind of reception did it receive?

It is good you are asking this question. We have been invited to present papers at international medical congresses of very high standards (see Box 2). These papers have outlined new ideas that have an application not only in homeopathy but in general medicine as well. These new ideas I have exposed in my book, *Levels of Health*², and in my article, *The Continuum of a Unified theory of Diseases*³. The paper we presented to the congress held at Harvard Medical School received the prestigious award of best poster⁴. So slowly but steadily we have started to infect conventional medical thinking with new ideas coming from homeopathy.

The activities coming from IACH and its dedicated students keep alive this great traditional healing methodology. I hope and believe that your journal will assist our efforts in order to spread the unique knowledge bequeathed to us by the great genius of Samuel Hahnemann. ● the proving in our Materia Medica.

This is hard work, because you have to have a knowledge of the remedies and then investigate the case in front of you in its global totality: mental, emotional and physical. The conscientious homeopath should not seek short cuts and clever ways to bypass the necessary knowledge that a well-trained homeopath must have.

Homeopathy is not psychoanalysis, in which you seek the root of the problem in mental or emotional trauma. The trauma can be on a somatic level and this is so most of the time, considering the pollution in which we live, the intrusion of multiple vaccinations from the very beginning of our earthly life, the virulent influence of drugs upon our immune system, etc, etc. Many homeopaths were misled into searching for non-existent shadows, far away from real symptoms on which to prescribe: a utopia called 'modern homeopathy' that misled thousands of students and left them totally disappointed.

See the expulsion of homeopathy from the NHS in the UK a few months ago. Do you think that this could have happened if homeopaths were in their majority successful practitioners with tangible results? The few successes here and there by the classical, conscientious homeopaths are not enough to persuade the different governments that this is a healing system worth supporting.

Unless it is understood that homeopathic practitioners should have a complete education on this extremely complex subject, there is no hope for a full recognition of homeopathy within the medical profession.
